

From: lisa@ljroseOnline.com

Date: March 10, 2011 11:18:22 AM PST

Here is link to film which has comment regarding accessibility re browsers on mobile devices.

The salient point is that just like companies being required to have an "officer" whose job is to monitor and deal with ADA compliance, someone like this needs to be working in companies designing and developing these devices whose focus is on Human Computer Interaction for the disabled community. ADA officers in companies do not have this expertise - they are largely dealing with HR issues vs. design and development and usability engineering issues. Usability issues require experts in usability (design, engineering, development). The need for such an "officer" is summarized in the last comment made by the individual interviewed in the film. Reasons for advocating for such an officer is exemplified throughout the film and companies will not do this until this is stipulated by the FCC (I know; I've been asking CEOs of some of these manufacturers over the last year and they are waiting for drivers like the FCC to push them to do it).

LjRose

Link to film: <http://www.youtube.com/user/humantoo#p/p>